From the Prez -

Can you imagine what flying would be like if those wonderfully familiar orange barrels were periodically in our flight paths? Every day I drive to work, a thirty two mile trip of which is currently approximately two thirds under construction, I look up and think it would be spiffy to have air under the wings as opposed to blacktop under the tires. It will make things better, though, right? It would be quite the sight to see aircraft stacked up in a bottle neck, narrowed to smaller areas. I supposed the barrels could be set up as drones, programmed to move from point to point based on construction progress. Thankfully, not a problem we're likely going to be encountering any time soon.

Last month for our meeting we had the chance to travel outside the area a bit and visited Al's new hangar. It was a bit breezy and cloudy, but definitely not a bad day for flying. Overall, I'd say we had a great time. I was hoping for a few more of us to be there, but attendance was good. It was also nice to see many fly in. Moving the meeting to a Saturday begs the question was it a good idea? Mondays have been our norm, but is the occasional switch to a Saturday morning acceptable and enjoyable? Think about that and we can discuss it in regard to future meetings.

As a closing thought, I've been looking over our rosters and meeting sign-in sheets for the last few years. While our numbers have been relatively stable, growing a bit now and then, I see many members who haven't been around for some time. There is no way all of us can ever be at every meeting; there are just too many things tugging at our attention to say we'll never miss a meeting. Perhaps it would help to reach out to them, see if there is reason they haven't been joining meetings that we can fix, and invite them back. So think about someone you used to see all the time when we got together, call them up, and see if they will come back. Happy flying everyone!

Dustin
